Invigorating the Realm of the Subaltern from the Lens of Gramsci to Spivak: A Historical Expansion with New Praxis

Aditi Abhishikta

Abstract

In the circumference of the post-colonial theory, the study of the subaltern which has remained one of the widely dubious concepts, this paper has attempted to revisit the historical expansions and new praxis in open dimensions. The exploration of the notion of the subaltern demands for the knowledge of the concrete outline of its pilot demarcations as it was formerly used by Antonio Gramsci, the Italian Marxist political activist, in his broadly acclaimed book 'Prison Notebooks'. This paper has also examined the new replications of the concept of subaltern as illuminated by the historians belonging to the Subaltern group of Studies. On this ground, a meticulous concentration has been laid on the key discernments of the progenitor of the group, Ranajit Guha, and on the modern conventions and ideas strengthened by the protuberant constructivist as well as the post-colonial critic, Gayatri Spivak, principally in her influential essay: "Can the Subaltern Speak?" The study has eventually undertaken some of the contemporary inferences of the subaltern concept as revealed in a post-modern circumstance. The paper has also magnified conjectures on significant ideas lead by Jean Baudrillard, the post-modern scholar and Sociologist and Homi Bhabha, the post-colonial critic.

Keywords: Subaltern, political mobilisation, division of labour, third world women, globalised post-modernism, identity, revolutionary voice, third space of enunciation.

As one of the widely integrated Contemporary Literary Theory, the study of the post-colonial theory has emerged with time and significance to be a profound discipline of exploration by a number of literary critics, scientists, economists, researchers and reformers. The incessant expansion and integration of the theory or study of post-colonialism finds its strong traces in the domains of Literary Theory and Criticism, Cultural Studies, Global Literature and Anthropology. The study of the Subaltern or Subaltern research collective is known to have been recognised as a subdivision in the recent times of 1980's by some of the eminent scholarly critics.

A Critical Insight into the Literary Maneuver of Chitra Divakaruni: An Overview

Dr Aditi Abhishikta

The experience of an individual is greatly manifested by the condition of gender, social, economic and educational factors. In the words of Edward Said in his article, "The Public Role of Writers and Intellectuals", the author leads a vital role in "testifying to a country's or a region's experience, thereby giving that experience a public identity forever inscribed in the global discursive agenda" (27). Literary narratives by women writers like Anita Desai, Bharati Mukherjee, Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni have witnessed a smooth swift since the independence crossing the transcending boundaries of culture. Like many other writers Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni's literary output is not away from the experiences of her own. She has come a long way in this literary endeavour. Her extensive study and the struggles with

WOMEN AS LEADERS IN LITERARY NARRATIVES: AN INSIGHTFUL INTERPRETATION

Aditi Abhishikta

ABSTRACT

Since conversations are spawned by probing literature, it is significant that the literary narratives be read carefully that unveils various conscious issues on the concept contribution of women in the field of literature. Identity is a frequently explored theme in many of the literary manoeuvres in general. Exemplification of individual fractured identity issues as well as a close realization of the self is such concepts which are powerfully present as thematic elements in narratives. Explicitly in the creative writings of Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni, it is through disintegration that Divakaruni often detects struggles and elucidates distress. Intricate, disintegrating understandings of persons in different circumstances efficiently and powerfully exist in the novel along with persistent engagement of fracturing in terms of language, structure, imagery and character. The paper attempts in unfolding the leading personification of the writer as well as her characters in literary narratives.

Keywords: personification, power of mind, identity integration, woman as leader, literary excellence

CHAPTER 8

An Intrinsic Insight into the Contemporary Post-Modern Literary Image of 'Hyperrealism' in the Lens of David Foster Wallace

Aditi Abhishikta

Foster Wallace unfoded the datum intact that the fictions produced in the early 1990s by the American authors gave birth to a new genus of fiction, and bidden to explicate the footings on which that narrative was recounting. In the following times, a good collection of authors and reviewers have progressively acknowledged that there has indeed been the existence of a kind of profound high post modernism imprint in many of the remarkable and appealingly efficacious productions by the geniuses like Thomas Pynchon, John Barth and Robert Coover in their narratives.

Likewise, efforts have been put by many to label the outline of this alteration and elucidate the essential foundations of the squabble being stirredupon. Through in most of the exemplary grounds, these efforts determine that fictionsat contemporary times propose an expansion of or redeploying on some of the derelict facets of postmodernist literature. In some of the works such as Jeremy Green's 2005 Late Postmodernism: American Fiction at the Millennium and or, The Cultural Logic of Just-in-Time Capitalism, by Jeffrey T. Nealon in 2012 for instance, infer the notion of 'late postmodernist' or 'post-postmodernist' narratives as mark of escalation of the influence of late capitalist economies and microelectronic intervention on ethnic making. In some other works such as the writers of the essays in Alison Shonkwiler and Leigh Clare La Berge's 2012 Reading Capitalist Realism and James Wood (albeit less flatteringly) in his 2000 review 'Human, all too Inhuman,' advocates that
